Creating the World was commissioned by the Paul Dresher Ensemble with funding from the Meet the Composer/Reader's Digest Commissioning Program.

It is a setting of "Creating the World," translated from the Polish by Czeslaw Milosz and Robert Hass, from Provinces by Czeslaw Milosz, Ecco Press, 1991. Used by permission.

The text is performed by Roger Rees. The Bangladesh lullaby is performed by M. Faslur Rahman. There are also quotations of music by Puccini, Mozart, Lassus, Scheidt, Stravinsky, Ciconia, Machaut, Monteverdi, Bach, Beethoven, Vivaldi, CPE Bach, and two uncredited medieval chants.

The composer would like to thank Paul Dresher, Ed Harsh, Kathleen Supové, Nurit Tilles, Molly Thompson, Rachel Cooper, Hillary Jackson, and Robin Lorentz for advice and support far beyond the normal bonds of friendship while this piece was being written.

Creating the World

I had cut Milosz's poem "Creating the World" out of The New Yorker when it was printed there several years ago, and when Paul Dresher called to ask me for a piece for his ensemble, I knew the time had come for me to take it on. Because the instrumentation of Paul's ensemble allows for the possibility of live performance and control of A LOT of pre-recorded samples, it seemed the perfect opportunity to create a world of hedgehogs and sopranos and urban intersections and Mozart. At first, everything was big fun: I had a great time recording the text with the wonderful actor Roger Rees; I spent weeks collecting recordings of virtually every sound mentioned in the poem (including something like forty different settings of the word "gloria"); I became obsessed with Tosca (which became the soprano sample) and saw about four different performances of it (both live and on video: NYC is a great place for creating the world(!)); studied the complete works of Joni Mitchell from the point of view of guitar tuning (which ended up not being incorporated into the piece at all)... And then the abyss hit me. I realized I could not knit all these wonderful samples into a piece until I had a way of making sense of the central contradiction of the poem: that all the creation in the world does not necessarily make meaning. And it really threw me. I went back and read Milosz again, not only the poems, but also The Captive Mind, his analysis of the totalitarian mind-set, and A Year of the Hunter, his journal from 1987 (around the time he wrote "Creating the World"), and things got even worse: all the horrors of the twentieth century came crashing down on me. The abyss of meaninglessness became the abyss of actual evil. The image of the Soviet soldiers standing outside the city watching the Germans destroy Warsaw for them became real for me, became my history. Gradually I went back to the poem itself, to its feeble invocation of feasts of love as protection against the abyss, and I remembered a lullaby that my Bangladeshi friend Babu (M. Faslur Rahman) had sung for me this summer, a very private form of love feast. And I started thinking about the Dionysian feasts of love that pervade every human culture, and I figured that the brittle present-directed pleasure of house music is the current American embodiment of that protection. And so you will hear these feasts of love, and I hope they will protect you as they protect me.
